"SPOTLIGHT" IS ON MR. DUSCHIK: I am a second grade teacher at Crest View, and this is my fourth year at Crest View and my eighth year overall. I have also spent time as a social worker. I am married with two adult children, with my youngest a junior in high school. I am currently working on my doctorate in education, specializing in the field of literacy. I am interested in applying this education towards closing opportunity gaps for many students of color, as evidenced by persistent underachievement as compared to their white counterparts. To this end, I am learning every day, how to make my classroom equitable for all students.

Nurse Notes:

Understanding Food Expiration Dates

Did you know that the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) does not regulate food expiration dates? And, several different types of expiration dates appear on food products, which can add to the confusion about how long food is safe to eat. Some commonly used food label dates include:

- “Sell By” Date: This date indicates how long a food product should be displayed on store shelves.
- “Use By”/ “Best if Used By” Date: Manufacturers use this date to indicate how long a food product will maintain its optimal taste and texture.
- Expiration Date: This date indicates how long a food product is safe to eat.
